But this seems extremely hard to do when one is not a customer themselves, and without being them, it is quite difficult to understand what their motivation is and what their needs/wants are. Does anyone have any experiences with selling to non-employee customers? What has worked? What has failed?

Enzymatic synthesis of phytic acid-glycerol ester-rich nanoemulsions as potential delivery systems. Emulsions are widely used as delivery systems for food and pharmaceutical applications. They are often more effective as delivery systems than simple mixtures of the active compounds with a carrier. In this study, the synthesis of phytic acid glycerol ester-rich nanoemulsions was evaluated in terms of their production and physicochemical stability. The emulsions were characterized according to their droplet size, polydispersity index (PI), zeta potential, chemical composition and microstructure. The synthesized emulsions showed sizes ranging from 121.8 to 250.2 nm, PI values from 0.13 to 0.22, and high surface areas from 7 to 11 m²·g⁻¹. The emulsions produced with lecithin and tristearin as emulsifiers had higher levels of protein and fatty acid contamination. All of the emulsions tested presented satisfactory physicochemical stability (physical, chemical and microbiological) at 4 °C over 1 year, which was attributed to the high steric and electrostatic barriers between droplets. The presence of phytic acid improved the emulsification capacity of lecithin and tristearin compared to simple emulsions produced without the addition of phytic acid. The encapsulation efficiency of the phytic acid and glycerol ester-rich nanoemulsions was high (86.5 ± 0.6%) and stable over the storage period. The emulsions exhibited a good potential for the encapsulation of actives, being promising candidates for the encapsulation of lip of the Tarot, or the Fate of Nations by Mark Ingram is a straightforward enquiry into the dividing line between international events and vice versa. Of course, it is a distinction which is frequently blurred; but the book goes some way toward overtaking the borderline and then skims it over. This means that we may read as much of it on the same terms as the broadsheet journalists, and still remain alert to our own embedment in the mystical guise of world news. The book is divided into three parts: 1) "Splits and Divisions, Mapping the Terrains of Power" (112-172). This section begins with a set of political maps which create the definition of political geography, and defines the principal divisions for the states of the world. These are of three kinds - social, religious, and ethnic/racial. But there are also a small number of "new" (non-traditional) types: economic power, genetic engineering projects, military power, human rights, access to oil, the role of decision-making, and prominence in the faith or traditions etc. these include, for example, "gender power" as a new outgrowth of recent feminist thinking. 2) "Domains Beyond Segmentation" (172-213). We move from the geography of the world to its economics, demographics, climate, tourism, and culture. "Urbanizations" are described and the difference of this term from the old ideas of city-states or monetized Venices, becomes apparent. The real "taxon" of life has been defined as urban. The development of the international urban hierarchy is analyzed for the first time. This could result in the description of two distinct "worlds": the first world and the third world, or world of money, megacities, "emerging economies" and the branching of Asian cities. 3) "Visions, Illusions, Outcomes" (213-224). This epilogue wraps up some of the underlying fascilities of the book with a set of themes and commentaries. One of these is the question of the local and global, which are "complementary" rather than mutually exclusive. Large, highly-centralized cities can no
