As a system for thinking about the problem of political organization, liberalism is closely connected with modern technological development, which symbolizes a large social transformation. The main political orientation of the West has been liberal. In the past, most social problems were caused by a violation of the norms of the communist's totalitarian system. That's why liberalism has always been struggling against communist totalitarianism. Liberalism says that every person is equal, and that everyone is allowed to develop his or her abilities. In recent history, all the major social problems have been caused by the collapse of traditional communist totalitarianism. The liberal model is still applicable in many of these problems, but the model itself has become fuzzy and flimsy because of its own success. For example, a social system needs to be based on a belief in the law, and to which law? Will this law be created by elites? What is the cause of the system? What is the effect of the system? The key to understanding both communist totalitarianism and liberalism is the concept of civil society. The weakness of the liberal model is that it overlooked the importance of the social groups within which individuals live. The weakness of the communist model is that it focused only on the individual and overlooked the importance of non-material social groups. Both systems had their own fundamental weaknesses. The first generation of modern social phenomena is primarily a product of scientific development. In other words, the emergent social phenomena are formed as a reaction to the dominant technologies and cultural models. Examples include the emergence of nationalism (national identity and culture), capitalism (economic accumulation), and communism (totalitarian and political control). In recent years, the third system that has emerged is social globalization, which reflects the convergence of culture and technology. The West has begun to feel the hegemony of China and India. As a result, it has changed its place as the global power. The resulting power situation will be deepened by the shift to high technology industries. The first generation of modern social phenomena is primarily a product of scientific development. The emergence of collective intelligence and the modern period are the product of scientific scientific developments. The second generation of modern social phenomena is primarily a product of the newly found industrial development. These phenomena are formed due to industrialization, urbanization, and the development of urban and rural economies. The third generation of modern social phenomena is primarily a product of the globalization of information technologies. Globalization is a new phenomenon that is reflected in b7e8fdf5c8
