That means that copyright is now human-chosen. The CC-BY-NC-SA model is designed to provide everyone free and unlimited access to content from many sources. This means a whole new world. That is also the reason for Eula 2.0. Eula 2.0 is a community-driven initiative and a handbook for making online services more usable and accessible. Eula 2.0 is designed to move rapidly, to evolve and to change directions. It is already a community wiki. It is also a project for archiving. Eula 2.0 is based on a document that explains the features and functions of free licensing and is available in various languages. The text is written in so-called "human readable" text. In principle, any language is allowed and often encouraged. The first comprehensive discussion of the text is found in the web forum: A link to the text is found on Every language has the right to use a translation, so you may find the text in many other languages. What is more, if someone finds more features in the text, they are welcome to write them up and submit them to the wiki. The work is done via the wiki, so the life-span of a feature is long. I am the initiator of this wiki. I am a member of a team of volunteers and we are building it. We are also looking for people that are interested in opening for discussion and/or writing about specific parts of

What's New in the Segmento 3D Desktop Toy?

The ransomware Cryptolocker uses an interesting mechanism to remain hidden. The attack starts with an email that arrives in the victim's inbox. The email contains a ZIP archive that is said to contain a critical security update for the victim's computer. In order to install this file, the user is prompted to download and unzip it first. This ZIP file contains a number of files, but does not appear to have any malicious component other than the usual ransom note which is placed at the top-left of the screens. By the time the user opens the archive for the first time, the whole contents are encrypted. What follows is the encryption process. The encryption process itself is quite simple and straightforward. Each file that is found within the ZIP archive is encrypted. The process involves two rounds of encryption, with each round being performed on the last round's encryption result. This way, the encryption process can be broken by the victim only with the help of a decryption tool or by paying a ransom. Although the encryption process of Cryptolocker is simple, it results in very strong security. For this reason, the files that are encrypted are quite large, taking a lot of space on a disk. But this is not the extent of the damage that is created by the attack. Cryptolocker also uses the AES algorithm for encryption. AES is a very fast encryption algorithm, but it is almost impossible to get the original keys by guessing. Instead, the user is instructed to contact the attacker's email and pay the required ransom. Once the user pays the ransom and gives the email and telephone numbers, the attacker will contact the user and demand a ransom for the decryption key. The attacker will also demand the telephone number of the nearest police, as well as the license number of the user's computer. The attacker will further request the user to give them the recovery disk of the host, which is said to include all the recovery options. But before the user can do any of that, they will have to double-check the files that are encrypted. This is just to ensure that the victim is not considering paying the ransom to someone who already stole their files. After the files are checked, the user can contact the attacker and pay the required ransom. The user is instructed to do that by clicking on a link that is placed in the email that is sent to the user. This link is supposed to be placed inside a numbered folder, each of which contains a unique key. Once the user has given the ransom payment,
